ABSTRACT

The role of women in management has become a topic of interest and importance during the last few years. This bibliography was compiled as a contribution to the Krannert Graduate School of Industrial Administration's seminar, The Emerging Role of Women in Management, held March 19, 1976. The materials included have been limited to those dealing with women managers in the business world. Similar activities of women in such fields as engineering, science, education, and library service have been excluded. The bibliography is divided into two parts. The first part is organized by publication format, while Part 2 includes books and articles arranged in broad subject categories. (Author)

INTRODUCTION

The role of women in management has become a topic of interest and importance during the last few years. This bibliography was compiled as a contribution to the Krannert Graduate School of Industrial Administration's seminar, The Emerging Role of Women in Management, held March 19, 1976. The materials included have been limited to those dealing with women managers in the business world. Similar activities of women in such fields as engineering, science, education, and library service have been excluded. No bibliography can ever be considered complete and comprehensive as new material is constantly being published. This bibliography is meant to be a research tool, and to demonstrate the wide range of materials available on women in management.

The bibliography is divided into two parts. The first part is organized by publication format. Except for significant periodical articles, these entries are not repeated in the subject groupings contained in Part II.

No systematic search for pertinent dissertations was made. However, references to dissertations encountered during the preparation of the bibliography have been grouped together for convenience. Historical, as used in the section "Historical and Statistical Background", includes references prior to 1950. Citations include pagination where it was felt this information would be useful, particularly in the "Bibliographies" section.

Part II includes books and articles arranged in broad subject categories. "The Changing Environment for Women" includes general works on the new roles of women in society, and especially those works that discuss women's participation in the work force. The attitudes, stereotypes, and fears held by corporations and businessmen about women managers are the subjects of materials listed under "The Business World and Women Managers". Contrasting viewpoints are shown in the articles in "Women Managers: Their Business World." In these articles many women (and men) discuss women's role and opportunities in business. Also included are biographical sketches about specific women in business.

The Author Index begins on p. 44. Anonymous articles are not indexed, but corporate entries are included. More extensive treatments of a subject are indicated by an asterisk.
